1. Counter Forms

Counter Forms is a webpage dedicated to selling original fonts made by the owners of the page or submitted by other people.

This page caught my attention because the text elements on it are designed as if they were pieces of paper cut out from a newspaper or a magazine and pasted into a blank paper, which fits perfectly with the page's main theme.

There is a toggle on the top right of the page, right next to the 'clock' that allows you to deactivate the overlapping of the texts or reactivate it to have them rearranged in a different way.

The texts featured in the main page can be divided into two sections, examples of fonts and information. All of this texts may suffer a colour change when the page is refreshed, with the examples having more drastic changes, but the best part is that, on refresh, the examples change so every time you visit the page it has a different aspect.

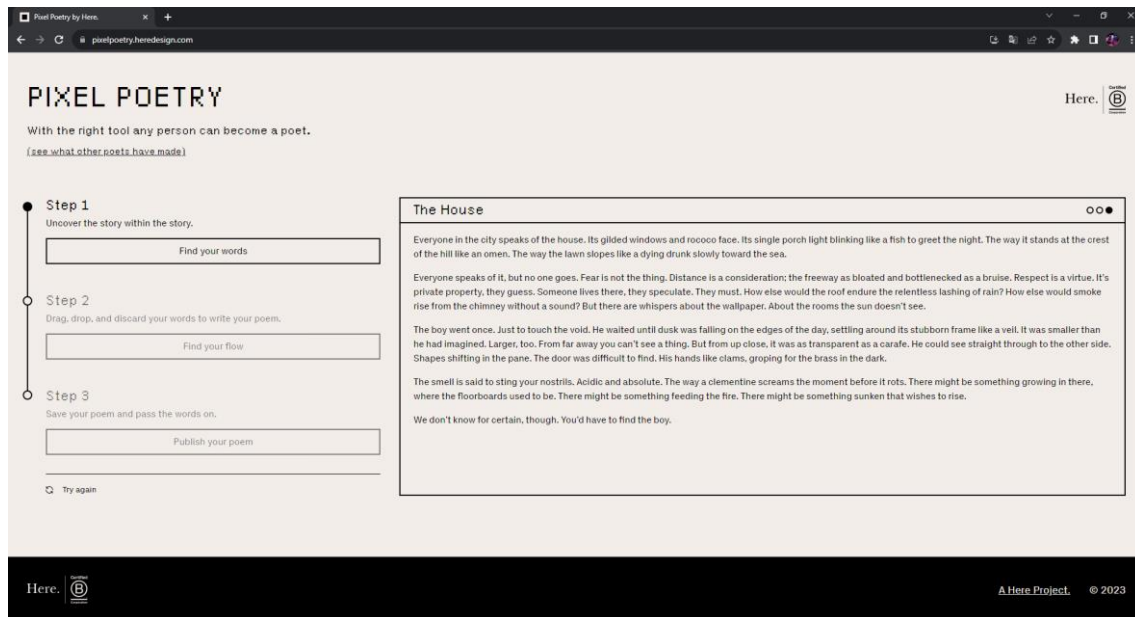

2. Pixel Poetry

Pixel Poetry is a simple web that allows you to create poems based on random words extracted from a given text. You can edit the order and add punctuation but you can't add new words.

I think what dragged me most about this page is its strange combination of pixel art and poetry, two elements that are not mixed together often. This gives the page an odd but original look.

The interface is very straightforward with old styled pixelated windows to display the poems and a few buttons to navigate it. You can also see other people's creations on a slow scrolling-down screen.

A very pure design, that fits perfectly the simplicity of the poems themselves but makes the site appear warm and home-like.
